Silent Auction of many handmade crafts and other items!

This month is all about the Auction. Saturday, September 15 will be here before we know it. There are so many lovely quilts to put bids on, I am sure there will be a few "wars" which are always entertaining. Auctioneer Joey Tomlinson is certain to be a hoot with his wonderful chatter. The boutique and the silent auction have items that should be enough to tempt any savvy quilter. If you have never come to the auction, or if it has been a few years since you were present, then be sure not to miss this one. Also, if you are a regular attendee, please, pass the word along. Let us make this auction a roaring success!

9.18 Pieces of the Past, 101. Handkerchiefs by Ellen Hernandez

Small pieces of fabric similar to what is now called a handkerchief were used to shield the Chinese from the sun according to statues from 1,000 BC. Romans waved handkerchiefs in the coliseums and races began when the hankie was dropped. Knights carried a special lady's handkerchief into battle. Many portraits from the 1500s include handkerchiefs, such as this excerpt done by Moro of Queen Catherine of Portugal. Shakespeare wrote of handkerchiefs, and confusion over ownership resulted in the death of Othello and his wife.

These bits of fabric were not always used to wipe the face or nose, or douse with perfume to mask body odor. They were considered a valuable asset, often reserved for royalty. Louis XVI wrote a law that all handkerchiefs had to be a square, and he prohibited anyone from carrying a hankie larger than his. Queen Victoria's hankies were embroidered with gold and silver thread. In 1843 James Fenimore Cooper wrote a short story about the life of high society women in 'The Autobiography of a Pocket Handkerchief.'

During the time of rationing in WWII, many women appreciated a new hankie when they could not afford a new outfit. Soldiers and aviators often wore a kerchief printed with an escape map of the area they were invading like this waterproof silk escape map of the Philippine Islands from 1944.

Handkerchiefs have been made of cotton, silk, linen, and synthetics. Some hankies were embellished with lace, crochet, tatting, embroidery, or cutwork. Ladies often had two hankies – one for show, and one to blow. Besides for the nose, hankies have been used for many purposes: a bandage, cleaning, polishing shoes, sweat band, neckerchief, head scarf, wardrobe decoration, dancing, romantic gestures, and respiratory protection. In the UK hankies with tied corners are worn as sun hats at the beach. During the Civil War era a sugar cube for sucking was put in the head of a hankie doll to keep children quiet during church. A hankie passed down through generations might be made into a christening bonnet and repurposed years later to add to a wedding bouquet.

Hankies were used to portray political ideas, household instructions, travel destinations, etc. The Ministry of Health in England encouraged the use of handkerchiefs in the 1940s with a poster and film campaign – 'Coughs and sneezes spread diseases.'

The handkerchief era was greatly impacted by the invention of the Kleenex in the 1920s, which promoted a more healthy, disposable feature. Little Golden Book in the 1950s featured Little Lulu with things to make and do using Kleenex.

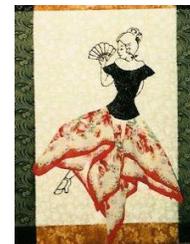

Artist and textile designer Tammis Keefe created over 400 whimsical hankie designs in the 1940s-50s. She was one of first to sign her name conspicuously on front of her work and her vintage designs are well sought after still today.

Historian Ann Mahony has a collection of over 5,000 vintage handkerchiefs with themes from nursery rhymes to golfing.

Quilters are fond of upcycling vintage hankies as is or with transforming patterns such as butterflies, bonnet girls, dancers, baskets, and fans.
